

THURSDAY, SEP 16 2004

XM to Start Internet Radio Service

 filed under portableaudio

XM Radio has announced their intention to market their own internet radio station, rebroadcasting (or simulcasting, I guess) the 200+ channels of music that XM subscribers now receive for $8 a month (or $4 if you already get the satellite service). Their intention to launch their own internet radio station clarifies their highly-antagonistic attitude towards the time-shifting software TimeTrax, as well as their decision to remove the USB-enabled version of their radio from the market.

As much as I think they bungled the TimeTrax thing (threats of lawyers, the usual), I do like XM's programming. Many others do, too, including, I'm sure, an enterprising programmer who will figure out how to duplicate the record-to-disc functionality of Time Trax in software.

Read - XM Radio to start online music service [ArsTechnica]

Read - XM Radio tunes in online music service [CNet]

Related

TimeTrax: Convert XM Radio to MP3 [Gizmodo]

XM Archives [Gizmodo]

SPONSORSHIP

Gizmodo, part of the largest weblog media group, reaches over 600,000 gadget obsessives each month. For sponsorship opportunities, click here for more information.

Gizmodo posts continue below...

Email this entry to a friend

Email this entry to:

Your Name:

Your email address:

Send

Message (optional):